janitor of Rutgers College was, and is still, employed in that capacity, the swill was taken from the various houses connected with the college and was disposed of to Mrs. Gibson presumably for her hogs and pigs. She was not obliged to pay for this material. This disposition of the swill was made by Mrs. Gibson for some time until another person, a man, offered Mr. McCormick the sum of $100.00 per year for the swill, Mr. McCormick accepted this offer and was paid the $100.00 which he delivered to the authorities at Rutgers College. Some few days after, Mrs. Gibson came to McCormick unaware of the new arrangement and requested the swill as heretofore. She was told that the swill was being delivered to some other person.

The next information regarding the matter that Mr. McCormick has, is when he was called before the Rutgers authorities. He ascertained that Jane Gibson had gone to them with the story that Mc-Cormick refused to let her have the swill and that she had been paying McCormick the sum of $100.00 per year, which was probably a farce. The authorities after conferring with McCormick stated that they believed Mrs. Gibson was telling a lie. She had no further dealings with the college.

This is advanced merely as another suggestion on the point of credibility.
